One key factor in the birth rate is the availability of birth control. Women may want to diminish their family members, but they have no way to do so. In Ireland, for example, birth control is illegal. It's no wonder that Ireland has the highest birth rate in Europe. Where governments have made birth control easily available, on the other hand, birth rates have gone down. This is the case in Singapore, Sri Lanka, and India, as well as in Indonesia, Thailand, and Mexico. In these countries women have also been provided with health care and help in planning their families.

Yet another factor to influence the birth rate is infant mortality. In industrialized countries, infant mortality is around 1.5 percent. In less-developed countries, however, it can be 20 percent or more. Fearing their children's deaths, women tend to have more.

- ① In many countries birth control is an unlawful policy.
- ② The reason why women generally dislike to bear babies is that they want better jobs.
- ③ Women tend to have more children in Eastern countries than in Western countries.
- ④ They must arrange as many effective programs as possible to reduce population growth in many countries.
- ⑤ The enforceability of birth control and the percentage of babies dying in their first year have an effect on the birth rate.
