Then, a young woman who worked at a nearby tourist shop came out of the shop, holding some food. She went over to the poor woman, smiled at the child and handed over the food. Making mistakes is central to the education of budding scientists and artists of all kinds, who must have the freedom to experiment, try this idea, flop, try another idea, take a risk, be willing to get the wrong answer. One classic example is Thomas Edison's reply to a reporter who was lamenting Edison's ten thousand experimental failures in his effort to create the first incandescent light bulb. "I have not failed," he told the reporter. "I successfully discovered 10,000 elements that don't work." Most children, however, are denied the freedom to noodle around, experiment, and be wrong in ten ways, let alone ten thousand. The focus on constant testing to measure and standardize children's accomplishments has intensified their fear of failure. It is certainly important for children to learn to succeed; but it is just as important for them to learn not to fear failure.

A person who works on an assembly line is well aware of the efficiency that can be gained through repetition. The craftsmen who work on building clocks gain tremendous efficiency between the first time a clock is built and the hundredth time. After multiple repetitions of the same routine, the assembly person instinctively knows where to reach for each subsequent part. They learn how best to grasp and position the new parts to insure the gears are aligned and components are properly seated. Over time the movements become fluid and instinctive. There is little brainpower needed for each new assembly as the mind wanders and the body simply goes through the motions. Every manufacturing plant worker or manager is well aware of the value of _____.

- ① creativity
- ② familiarity
- ③ curiosity
- ④ honesty
