문 6.

Competition in sports, it has been argued, is ethically defensible when it involves participants in a mutual quest for excellence. In effect, competitors should view themselves as under a moral obligation to their opponents. Each competitor is obligated to try his or her best, so that opponents can develop their own skills and be genuinely tested. In this view, sports are absorbing to spectators and participants alike precisely because they involve both our minds and bodies so fully in meeting a challenge, a challenge worth meeting for its own sake.

- ① Demerits of Competition
- ② Moral Obligations in Competition
- ③ Methods of Winning in Competition
- ④ Side Effects of Competition

문 7.

There are over 30,000 different kinds of spiders in the world. Spiders live in all different kinds of climates and environments from blazing deserts to damp caves and towering mountain tops. What enables spiders to survive in such diverse environments? Silk.

Every spider is born with the ability to produce silk. This wondrous tool of survival is used by spiders to catch their dinner and escape from danger. Spiders adapt the use of their silk according to the situation they find themselves in. For example, to catch an insect in a web, they make the web out of two different kinds of silk. The outer part of the web which is attached to a tree, flower or pole is rigid and strong so it does not break. On the other hand, the middle part of the web is flexible so that when an insect flies into it, it will stretch rather than break. This center silk can stretch up to four times its original length. When spiders are in danger, they can escape by flying through the air at the end of an instantly made silk dragline. The dragline is sticky and easily attached to a solid surface.

When the media report on cloning in the news, they are usually talking about only one type called reproductive cloning. There are different types of cloning, however, and cloning technologies can be used for other purposes besides producing the genetic twin of another organism. A basic understanding of the different types of cloning is the key to taking an informed stance on current public policy issues and making the best possible personal decisions. The following three types of cloning technologies will be discussed: recombinant DNA technology or DNA cloning, reproductive cloning, and therapeutic cloning.

You have probably heard the proverb that "Blood is thicker than water." But it is not necessarily better than water. Many friends are more helpful, kind, and generous than family and you need to connect to them. Even when you have a wonderful family, or one that has not been fraught with divorce, abuse, or indifference, the great gains you get from creating a family of choice—a close circle of friends—decreases your chances of getting the blues. We treat our circle of friends like good brothers, sisters, fathers, or mothers; they are there for us when our own family is _____ because of geography or an unwillingness to help.

- ① nearby                      ② commensal
③ jubilant                  ④ unavailable

If high technology is the unstoppable force, here is the immovable object: Cattle subsist largely on grass. Cows need to be led to where the grass is ㊦. To achieve that requires no more and no less than an individual on horseback, accompanied by a rope and maybe a decent stock dog or two—all set on a landscape detached from urban ㊧, not to mention cell phone service.

Over two million years ago, primitive human beings took up stones and began transforming them into ____㉓____. What were once nothing more than pieces of debris were deliberately reworked into tools to be used to strip the bark from wood and roots, or to slice the tough outer hide from a dead animal. Although perhaps not as impressive a feat as space travel, the creation of these humble tools marks a turning point in human evolution. No other species has been as ____㉔____ as the human has in adapting nature to serve its purpose.

Though couched in indirect terms, Barack Obama's inaugural address was a stark repudiation of the era of George W. Bush and a vow to drive the United States into "a new age" by reclaiming the values of an older one. It was a delicate task, with Mr. Bush and the former vice president, Dick Cheney, sitting feet from him as he described the false turns and the roads not taken. In his words, Mr. Obama blamed no one other than the country itself—"our collective failure to make hard choices" and a willingness to suspend national ideals "for expedience's sake." Yet every time Mr. Obama urged Americans to "choose our better history," to make decisions according to science instead of ideology, to reject a "false choice" between safety and American ideals, to recognize that American military power does not "entitle us to do as we please," he signaled a commitment to pragmatism not just as a governing strategy but as a basic value.

문 19. According to his inaugural address, how can Obama's evaluation of George W. Bush's era be characterized?

- ① infusive                      ② negative
③ sympathetic                ④ roborant

문 20. Which of the following is not true of the passage?

- ① Dick Cheney attended Obama's inaugural ceremony.
- ② Obama seems to believe that Bush's government made easy choices.
- ③ Americans have made decisions based on science rather than ideology.
- ④ Pragmatism appears to be Obama's basic value.
