Accordingly, he sent her to a hospital to be prepared for the operation and he, at the same time, hired a small boy to catch a frog for him. To give the woman the impression that she had really had an operation, an incision was made in her abdomen, and the doctor showed her the 'frog', in a bottle of alcohol, which had presumably been removed from her stomach. Until recently, humans had little impact on the oceans. However, as the earth's population increases, human activity will ultimately destroy the oceans unless immediate steps are taken.

Overfishing is one major threat. Fish are being taken out of the oceans faster than the remaining fish can reproduce. A big fish like tuna, shark, or swordfish yields many pounds of delicious seafood when it reaches maturity. However, to meet the increasing demand for these fish, commercial fishermen began catching small, immature fish. In the process, they almost destroyed the species.

Humans are impacting ocean life not only by what they take out of the oceans, but also by what they put into the oceans. Carelessly discarded cans, bottles, plastic cups, and baby diapers find their way into the stomachs of fish, often killing them.

What can be done to terminate the steady destruction of the ocean? Among other steps, countries can set limits on the number of fish that fishermen can legally catch. Governments can also protect the sea by enacting strict controls on ocean dumping. And individuals can refuse to buy fish in restaurants and markets if the species is threatened.
